Official launch of humanoid robots for warehouse

Geekplus announced the official launch of Gino 1, the world's first general-purpose robot designed specifically for warehousing scenarios (link). Geekplus reveals that Gino 1 possess human-like ability to perform multiple warehouse tasks including picking, box/case moving, packing and inspecting. Based on our understanding, Gino 1 will be packaged together with AMR products as solution offerings to client at this stage, before entering the stage of promotion and mass production. We believe, through the launch of Gino 1, Geekplus is on track to capture the picking and packaging segment in the warehouse automation. We will revisit our TP (currently HK$26.7, based on 7.7x 2026E P/S) after the release of the full-year earnings. Maintain BUY.

- Embodied intelligence to expand downstream applications. Geekplus's embodied intelligence mainly refers to AI-powered robotic arm picking and general-purpose robots. As mentioned by management in 2025, 60-70% of human work in the warehouse can be performed by warehouse fulfilment AMRs, while the remaining 30-40% (mainly picking and packaging) can be performed by robotic arms. Geekplus believes downstream expansion can further enhance the solutions offering to customers.
- Investment theme. On the back of technological innovation in autonomous mobile robots (AMR) with >800 end customers across 40 countries, Geekplus (80% revenue from overseas in 1H25) is set to ride on the structural increase in the penetration rate of warehouse fulfilment AMRs over the coming years.
- Key risks. (1) Technology risk; (2) threat of new entrants; (3) Unable to achieve turnaround of profit.
